4 - 4. Please list any suggestions you have for a new vision statement.

- Add something about students behaviour more.

- Best to put a vision statement in present tense verb form, so as to connote a sense that this is already occurring, not that you are waiting around for it to happen. PSC "will be" the college of choice implies that you're still trying to get there. Also, the excellence needs to have modifier. Academic excellence, scholarly excellence. But just plain excellence doesn't point faculty in a certain direction, nor does it communicate precision to the student or potential admit. I would also add "in Nebraska," but I guess that is a matter of choice. You may want to add something about a small town feel. I'm also a parent of a high school child. PSC or WSC (my alma mater) would be my first choice based partially on both college's small town communities. Lastly, you're missing some commas.

5 - 5. Additional comments.

- I don't know the vision statement.
- Maybe the state college should have stricter standards for college admittance
- Students/projected students don't pay attention to the vision statement. Most of them don't even know it exists.
- The current vision statement is very good.
- Perhaps a phrase about our professors.
- Have a visiting professor outside of Western narrative (ie Palestine, Israel, turkey, Afghanistan, Japan), teaching history that gives students a more diverse, dimensional perspective.
- none
- "...a college of choice fostering excellence..." The phrasing and word choice feel like a weird combination to me, and not as powerful as it should be as a college vision. Maybe the word "cultivate"? Cultivate excellence?
- "will be a college of choice fostering excellence"- choice of what- classes, instructors, be the college that the student ultimately chooses? A different synonym such as cultivate, nurture, or the like seems a better fit than foster
- You need something that will take the institution to the next level...some form of differentiation from any other college that sets it apart.
